The US Consumer Product Safety Commission, in conjunction with the American National Standards Institute, released more details about the battery safety test plan. The tests, due to start in July, will look at the performance and safety of lithium-ion batteries made for consumer electronics devices such as cell phones, video cameras, and notebook computers. It is the first time the government and industry have gathered together to come up with a comprehensive battery safety test plan. The plan is intended to give consumers a greater understanding of the safety attributes of consumer batteries, to educate them about different battery types, and to aid in the promotion of battery safety and the safe recycling of consumer products. In the event of a malfunction, the new plan requires that the battery be "prevented from contacting the conductive part of an operating electric or electronic device and render the device inoperable or unable to function." If a battery should be damaged but still attached to a device, it must be "immediately removed from the device and undergo post-failure testing to determine whether the battery fails to perform as required." The test plan has also asked for data on the effect of a battery failure on the performance of the device over a defined period of time, on temperature rise during a malfunction, on whether or not a battery will cause a fire, and on the safety of all electrical parts after a battery failure. Paul Stencken of the Consumer Product Safety Commission said in a press release
